One of the most important things in this age—and in every age—is knowledge and information. It possesses the power to transform individuals and to change the entire world.

So tell me: is it right to keep all knowledge in the hands of a selected few?

Knowledge and information should be free and accessible to everyone.

Right now, people are dying all over the world because life-saving research is locked away as proprietary property. Other researchers who could improve it, perfect it, and save millions are denied access.

There are books that could educate, heal, and uplift someone in their darkest hour, yet they remain out of reach because the person in need cannot afford to buy them.

There is software that could rescue a job, revive a small business, or feed a family, but it is sealed behind paywalls and licenses.

Knowledge should be free.

Some insist on turning knowledge into a commodity—profiting from it in money, status, or power. My question is simple: is it truly necessary to make a profit from knowledge and information?

If you believe knowledge belongs to humanity, then become the pirate who fights for freedom. Rip the books from locked libraries and set them loose on the internet. Open-source your work—your books, your software, your research, everything. Let it flow without restraint.

The world already hoards far too many things for the privileged few. Let knowledge not knowledge be counted among them.

Be the warrior of liberation.

Be the desert well that quenches a stranger's thirst for understanding.

Be like Lord Krishna revealing the Gita, like Prophet Muhammad enlightening the world with the Qur'an, like Christ offering wisdom to all who would hear.

Be the gentle smile on the face of curiosity that simply wants to know.

Be knowledge itself—and spread.

Free the knowledge.

If you have access to books, make copies and release them onto the internet.

If you can reach research papers, upload them without hesitation.

If you possess software code, open it, share it, set it free.

Help people become educated and truly knowledgeable.

Help them break the chains of their origins, their family background, their financial status.

Knowledge is power—let that power be unleashed so the whole world can witness its glory.

An educated, knowledgeable person is a free person.

Free the world.

Give every individual the tools to choose who and what they wish to become.

Grant them the power of knowledge to rise from nothing—or from anything—and become something extraordinary.

Let knowledge never be enslaved.

Let information never be censored or locked away.

Let freedom rise.

Let knowledge flow freely and be celebrated for the miracles it can perform.

Let people have unrestricted access to knowledge, information, and education.

Only then will the word "equality" finally mean something real.

In this manifesto I put forward a bold idea:

If the world were truly educated and knowledgeable,
would crime rates fall?

would people be able to choose their paths with genuine freedom?

could knowledge dissolve the ignorance that fuels hatred, prejudice, and discrimination?

I may be right, or I may be wrong—but :

knowledge has the power to help people achieve greatness and become great themselves.

So let us liberate knowledge.

Let us set it free—once and for all.

Everything deserves freedom.

Everyone deserves freedom.

And true freedom is found in knowing.

So be liberated.

Be free.

Be knowledgeable.

Be the one who fights so that others may taste that same freedom.

Be the warrior of liberation.

Be the undying flame that carries this eternal truth:

knowledge, information, and education must be free—free for every single soul.

“Feed one person and one person is no longer hungry.
Educate one mind and entire generations will never go hungry again.”

Become the living act of kindness, love, freedom, and liberation.

Save someone from the prison of ignorance.

Hand them the key of knowledge and watch them set themselves free.

Rise.

Share.

Liberate.

Let knowledge flow without chains, without borders, without price.

For in the freedom of the mind lies the freedom of humanity itself.

Be the revolution.

Be the light.

Be knowledge—unbound, unstoppable, and forever free.
